ARISE THROUGH ASCENSION

You're Different, She Said!

By Angela Blaha

As my mother always expressed, it was okay to be me because I was different. I have accepted the fact that I am different I am truly grateful for my mother kindly pointed that out to me for years. You see, I would hate to be a carbon copy of someone else, how boring would that be?

I have lived this life fighting the atrocities of what separation has done with this experience of being human, not because I am different, but because I am here to heal the pains of differences. As this experience of free will continues and as we move forward into the new paradigms there is a strong sense of finding our similarities rather than our differences. When we find threads of similar-ness we recognize a level of comfort that brings peace to our soul.

I find myself being in front of people who have always known at some level that they too are a little different, the thread of similarity runs through our veins as we know without a doubt we are one in the wholeness. We may be individual humans but there is a deeper sense of being whole with all that is, this is a deep truth for us.

We share similar yearnings for life, joy and bliss and deep loving relationships that support and provide safety are a must. We love being with people who understand us so we do not have to explain who we are, rather we explore who we are. We dive deep into conversations that last for hours as sleep is not needed when we are filled with passion about the possibilities of life.

We learn and support each other in ways that seem real only in fairy tales. We speak truths that would never leave the group because of fear of exile. We travel together so we can expand and transform in the safety of fellow supporters.

We remember the beginning of time and beyond, only to help us move out of the ignorance of the ego and into the love of the soul. Because remembering our pure essence is what will transform our differences, allowing us to see our similarities.

I know you know, deep down inside of you, you know you are here to change the world. You know you are a path creator rather than a path follower. We change the world with our calmness and our peace. We change the world with our gratefulness, our intelligence and our love.

The emotions that trick you into doubt, worry, anxiety and fear, kick them to the curb because they are part of your ego trying to keep you separate from the world.

Those thoughts that create distractions, lack of thinking and create stories that never come true, cast them out of you because they create fear in you that stops you from living passionately and aligning with your purpose.

These shifting times are amazing as we resolve the fear based patterns into wisdom and truth.
